TULSA BISHOP ‘GOES EAST’

(National Catholic Register by Zenit News Service)

TULSA, Okla.--The bishop of Tulsa explains his decision to celebrate Mass at the diocesan cathedral “ad orientem” -- facing east -- as an effort to recapture a “more authentic” Catholic worship.

Bishop Edward Slattery affirmed this in an article featured in the September edition of the diocesan newspaper, Eastern Oklahoma Catholic, titled, “Ad Orientem: Revival of Ancient Rite Brings Multiple Advantages, Some Misperceptions.”

In a discussion about liturgy, the bishop said, it is necessary to grasp this “essential” truth: “At Mass, Christ joins us to himself as he offers himself in sacrifice to the Father for the world’s redemption.”

The bishop continued: “When we study the most ancient liturgical practices of the Church, we find that the priest and the people faced in the same direction, usually toward the east, in the expectation that when Christ returns, he will return ‘from the east.’”

“At Mass, the Church keeps vigil, waiting for that return. This single position is called ad orientem (which simply means toward the east).”

This traditional posture lasted for nearly 18 centuries in the Church, he noted, as something that was handed on from the time of the apostles.

“In the last 40 years, however, this shared orientation was lost,” the bishop said. Now the priest and the people have become accustomed to facing in opposite directions. The priest faces the people while the people face the priest, even though the Eucharistic Prayer is directed to the Father and not to the people.

This innovation was introduced after the Vatican Council, partly to help the people understand the liturgical action of the Mass by allowing them to see what was going on, and partly as an accommodation to contemporary culture where people who exercise authority are expected to face directly the people they serve, like a teacher sitting behind her desk.

“Unfortunately this change had a number of unforeseen and largely negative effects. First of all, it was a serious rupture with the Church’s ancient tradition. Secondly, it can give the appearance that the priest and the people were engaged in a conversation about God, rather than the worship of God. Thirdly, it places an inordinate importance on the personality of the celebrant by placing him on a kind of liturgical stage.”

The bishop observed that the single eastward position “reveals the nature of the Mass” as an act of worship shared by the priest and the congregation.
