The Seven Capital Sins: Envy

With the beginning of Lent, we started our series on the seven capital sins with a discussion of gluttony and sloth. This week, we will take a look at another deadly sin which can become a horrible cancer in the soul and which is the source of so many grievous sins against our neighbor such as calumny, gossip, detraction, and many other sins.

Envy is characterized by ill-will, discontent or vexation at the good fortune or happiness of others; it is as if what the other person possesses or accomplishes somehow constitutes an evil done to oneself. Therefore, it seeks to deprive the other person of the good things they have through working to harm the other whether by word or deed. It also manifests itself as delight in the misfortune of another. In its most wicked and diabolical form, it becomes envy at another's spiritual good. This is the sin of Cain.

Envy must be distinguished from jealousy, which consists in an excessive love of our own good combined with the fear of losing the good that we have or the fear of being deprived of it by others. Envy must also be distinguished from the desire to become more like another person, for example, in their devotion or spirituality. This desire to imitate another is emulation, which, far from being a sin, is a praiseworthy sentiment which urges us to seek to acquire the good qualities and virtues of another.

The virtue opposed to envy is charity or brotherly love and kindness. Kindly actions quench the flames of envy. Other remedies for envy consist in repulsing the first hints of this sin which arise in one's mind. The crushing of these vile sentiments can be combined with distracting the mind and with always remembering that neither the good qualities of our neighbor nor his possessions can ever detract from that which is ours; all good gifts, whether given to us or to another, come from God and should be a source of rejoicing and thanksgiving. We should also cultivate the noble sentiment of emulation which is an effective remedy against envy and an excellent stimulus to our own growth with the help of God's grace.
